In principle, two different materials are mixed by either blending by simply mixing or by heat treatment. However, the selection of materials for such intermixed components for automotive and industrial applications requires special attention. Besides the material properties, the main challenge consists of the heat treatment effect of the materials. The objective in the selection of appropriate materials and their processing is to fulfill all technical requirements and to enable the materials to be processed into a homogeneous, all-metal, solid solution of the two components. The present invention relates in particular to the annealing of selected elements (e.g., Ni, Nb, Ti, and W) and atoms (e.g., Al, Cr, Ti, Hf, Zr, Mo, W) to obtain the required component properties such as high temperature strength, creep resistance, or oxidation resistance. For this, work pieces are processed in a diffusion furnace, for example, as disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,443,534, the entire contents of which are hereby incorporated by reference in their entirety. The highest possible material strengths at high temperatures are an important property for the purpose of increasing the service lives and reducing the weight of structural elements of lightweight materials. The thermal expansion during the hardening process is a decisive parameter in the materials selection. High strength, creep resistance, and high-temperature stability are the most important processability factors. During the hardening process, the
